While it is true that the media are often rather inartful when it comes to transgender topics, this time the reportage is particularly remarkable, especially when seen in context of the push for transgender bathroom access in Houston, which has the potential to make a lot of people a lot of money. The Houston Chronicle is heavily promoting the story, and has been using scare quotes around the name “transgender” for at least a few days. It is also pretty much exclusively reporting the story through the lens of a cisgender man’s murder. That’s not just very odd — the murder itself seems to have little to do with being transgender, even given the anecdote-laden coverage — it’s also potentially really harmful for transgender people. I’ve been trying to think of how best to describe this situation. The simple answer is that the reporting is “transphobic,” but there are other, subtler issues at play here. For example, there’s the issue of scare quotes. When the words “transgender” or “trans” are used in media contexts, it’s often understood that those terms are being used to signify a person’s gender identity, not the 82157476af
